

Icon under a microscope

THIS landmark is iconic and easily recognisable when you see the whole picture, but can you identify it from this small portion of the image?

This is only a small portion of about 40,000 interlocking basalt columns that make up this remarkable landmark.

Most of the columns on the UNESCO site are hexagonal, though some have four, five, seven or eight sides, with the tallest standing 12 metres.

Funnies Flashback

WE'VE trawled through the TD Window Seat archives to give you a blast from the past. Here's some gems from 20 Aug 2014:

SOMETIMES the urge to just get out and see a place can spur people to do rather odd things.

During a domestic holiday, a Danish man decided a detour to Rome to see a particular church was so necessary that he hired a taxi to drive him straight there.

Hopping into a taxi in the city of Odense one evening, he told the driver to drive him straight to Rome - a journey of 1,803kms costing DK29,226 (AUD$5,607).

Initially the driver thought the man wanted to be taken to the airport but no, the journey was for the entire trip to Rome.

Passing through Germany, Austria and Italy, the trip took three days, with the driver saying he didn't sleep during the drive.

He said when he eventually got home, he took three days off as he had just earned a month's salary in one trip.

Picnic and Sushi Days

TODAY happens to be a rare day where you can combine the celebration of a number of international days of the year, being International Picnic Day and International Sushi Day.

It's not known when International Picnic Day started being celebrated, but picnics in general became popular in France after the French Revolution and the largest picnic in the world was held with 20,000 people in Lisbon, Portugal in 2009.

Similarly, the origins of International Sushi Day are unclear, but sushi has been consumed in South-East Asia for many centuries, with the traditional form we are familiar with starting sometime between 1600 and 1800.

Today why not combine the celebration of picnics and sushi together and enjoy both at lunch.
